down to the ground. The original shingles are still on the sides, worn by the elements as thin as paper in many places. They were nailed on with wrought nails, evidently made at a blacksmith shop. There is a large brick chimney in the center of the house, connected with which are five fireplaces; an old-fashioned brick oven in the kitchen, and smoke-box for smoking meat in the attic. The door at the end is what is called a "mill door," cut across the center. There is an old iron or brass knocker on the upper part. The porch in front and the kitchen part at the rear are of the present century, the rest of the house remains about as originally constructed. The grounds belonging to the place cover nearly an entire square in the city of Bridgeport, and are at the terminus of the East Main street electric line, on the corner of North avenue and East Main street. William Pixley was thrown from his horse at Rocky Hill, in Pequonnock, Conn., and died from his injuries. The inventory of his property was taken March 17, 1712, amounting to £492–17, to which his widow made oath.

13.Alexander*, born ———.

14.Peter*, born November 11, 1702.

15. David, born November 11, 1704; died August 1, 1742, probably unmarried, and was buried in the old Congregational burying place in Stratford. The inscription on his tombstone is: "Here lyes Buried ye Body of Mr. David Pixley, Who Died August ye 1st, A. D. 1842, in ye 38th year of his Age."

6. Joseph (William[1]), born March 9, 1676, at Northampton, Mass.; died ———; married August 23, 1699, at Westfield, Mass., Abigail, daughter of John Clark, of Yarmouth and Farmington, Conn. Joseph Pixley moved to Westfield with his father about 1680, and was town clerk