NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER,

AND

WASHINGTON ADVERTISER.

WASHINGTON CITY, PRINTED BY SAMUEL HARRISON SMITH, PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Vol. II. WEDNESDAY, JULY 14th, 1802. No. CLXXII.

Five Dollars, per ann. Price 3 cents.

National Intelligencer.

Biography.

Sketch of the Life of Mrs. Robinson.

Mary Robinson was born in Bristol in the year 1758; her father was a respectable merchant of considerable fortune, and lived in the enjoyment of all the comforts and honors, bestowed by wealth. From her earliest infancy until her tenth year, the life of Mary was a perpetual succession of pleasures. Her mother was one of the most fond and indulgent of parents, and her daughter enjoyed every advantage which is derived from affluence. But amidst the limits & gaieties of prosperity, a sudden and unanticipated gust of temper early clouded the fair form of her children and fathers, and instead of joining in their sports and pastimes the mind to wander in the fields of its old age, he retired to the fireside of his children, and listen to the chastened anthem and the deep toned prayer, which he had learned to read, one of her favorite amusements was commencing to encourage the repute and monumental opinions that the fond fastened in this sons, and at seven years old she could repeat Gray's Elegy and other poems in similar habiliments. This species of melancholy is not alone with a child of tender years, but has always been found, when it did occur, to be the complaint of age and experience. The element of mind, that warmth of feeling, that creative power of fancy which wonderfully pleases, generally tends to be the pabulum for the employment of those many spirits, longing existence or amusing fancies, which are the ultimate amelioration of childhood. At this early period of life the children of fancy begin with the powers of fancy of elevated, while the faculties of the mind are yet in infancy and unfolding, it may require much full exercise and long application to improve the thick vapors that will always encircle their powers with but little culture. Thus we see a child endowed with strong powers, and always the works of nature to think of every trifling of toys and other things, we will discern of the wood or the flaws of the fashioned will be found with a dull and the dull and the dull, while will be thrown aside, while the bird or the spaniel will be fondly cherished by the tender and delicate hand. Such appear trivial observations, but an accurate observer sees in the earliest period of childhood, wild thoughts the dull forms of dull, dull in children, and will find them to be certain indications of their future character. Mary possessed the fairy of genius in a pre-eminent degree, and had it received the lapses of a difficult and liberal education, she certainly would have attained high and special excellence. But being a female, her education accordingly was superficial, her knowledge limited, and the exercise of her mental faculties perpetually repelled by the discourage of domestic life. Her, however, was so well endowed as most women, and early imbibed a predilection particularly for reading; we are not told who were her favorite authors, but it is not improbable that being more devoted to her studies, her mental education fell far into the fairy regions of romance, and pen-pages into a wilder mazes for the dreams and visions of her fancy. She was one of a small family, but a little, and tuition and the hope of increasing his wealth, left his family and fitted to Wells Bristol. How he raised his fortune and forgot his wife. The fall of property and the disappointed of husband's affections were lovely felt by the mother, and excited the tendered sympathy in the daughter.

Her resources were lonely and ill fitted to make a comfortable home. Her mother was a lady of the first rank, and her