MAJOR PHILIP SPEED.

Philip Speed, son of Judge John Speed and Lucy Fry, was born at the old Farmington homestead, near Louisville, April 12, 1819. He married Emma Keats, a daughter of George Keats, a brother of the poet, John Keats. He lived some time on a farm adjoining the Farmington tract. At that time his sister, Mrs. Peay, lived at the old homestead, and his brother, Smith Speed, lived on the Breckinridge place, near by. A few years before the Civil war he moved into Louisville. He was a Unionist when the war came, and was made paymaster in the army with the rank of major. He led a very active life during this period, going wherever the troops were, and was often exposed to danger. His home was then in Louisville, on Walnut street, near Eighth. He afterward removed to First street, where he lived the remainder of his life. He had a large family, and all his children were remarkably bright and handsome. His wife was a woman of great culture and refinement. The children were exceedingly fond of their parents, and were made happy in their home by every reasonable indulgence. There was never a happier household. Major Speed was fond of his friends and loved to entertain. His house was admirably adapted for that purpose. The parlors and dining-room were unusually large, and often were filled. The army officers, during the war, found his house a delightful place to visit. Generals Sherman, Anderson, Buell, Nelson, and many others of lesser rank were often there.

In the latter part of the war period Major Speed was appointed Collector of Internal Revenue, and held the office a number of years. He was a model officer, giving entire satisfaction to the Government and making friends of all who had dealings with the office. Afterward he was engaged in business connected with the cement companies, being superintendent of the Western Cement Association, in which occupation he remained until his death. He took a lively
