SIR,

No circumstance relating to the history of this western country, probably has excited, at different times, more general attention and anxious curiosity, than the opinion that a navigable river, flowing the West ward, exists beyond the Mississippi. By this name is to be understood, not the opinion entertained from the native country with a large party of emigrants—that either time will be a well or two pass back with the account a that they had discovered a country to the westward, and that the Indians again were fresh reinforcement and were resolved any more. The time when this, and other ventures discovered, it has been hoped, will was the continent of North America, and it has been conjectured that they landed on this continent from where the golden of Mexico, and from those proceeded northward, that they got out of the reach of the hostile natives, and travel thro' lives in the upper country of Mississippi. Many accounts accordingly have been published within the last 50 years of persons who in consequence either of accident or the amount curiosity have made themselves a acquainted with the land of mine, in Mississippi, pouring the completion of European, and the language of Wales. Some indeed the fell well with, indeed, it would affirm, perhaps, the mail fabulous fiction of the Indian tribes occasioned by a view of the various accurate fortifications with which the Ohio country abounds, of any that have been offered. These fabrications were evidently never made by the Indians. The Indian art of war prohibits the use of the kind. The probability too is that the persons who contributed them were at their time acquainted with the use of arms; the division of their fortifications, which are uniformly in the most fertile land of the country, indicates that they who made them, were of a civilized people, and the regularity, the care and skill with which they were executed, afford traits of the genius of a people, who relied more on their military skill than on their numbers. The growth of the trees upon them, is very compatible with the idea that it is not more than 300 years ago that they were abandoned.

This hints, however, are thrown out rather to excite enquiry, than by way of advancing any deciding opinion on the subject. Having never met with any of the persons who has been with white Americans, nor even received their testimony near the frontier, I have always considered Croftlandt's account, as fabulous. Late evening however, Mr. John Gibson of Jefferson county, a gentleman with whom I have been long acquainted, and who is well known to be a man of veracity, consented to relate to me, which as all events, appears to merit serious attention. After he had recited it in extenso, I requested him to repeat it, and commited it to writing. It has certainly been intended with of entertainment. The country which is delineated was altogether unknown to Virginia, and which reflects very great was probably very little known to the Shawnee Indians. Yet the accounts of it agree very remarkably with their discoveries. On my arrival, the story of the Indians, which by the mean time, probably has transpiring of the air of Indian and of their nationalitically spent know the huge good with the party which was upon the sixth Indian art flowing, very, to such a much to have the time time, the many weeks and even the Indians may probably have been figure to indicate people.

Without detaining you any more with preliminary remarks, I will proceed to the narration as I received it from Mr. Gibson.

Monikie Griffith, a native of Wales, which country he left when he was those 16 years of age, was taken a prisoner by a party of Shawnee Indians, about 40 years ago, near Will's fort, on the head of Roanoke river, in Virginia, and carried to the Shawnee nation. Having said there about two years and a half he found that five young men of the tribe, had a notion of attempting to explore the sources of the Missouri. He was upon them, in order to admit him as one of the party. They set out with five good rifles, and with six pounds of powder and lead, of which they were of to be very careful. On reaching the mouth of the Missouri they were struck with the extraordinary appearance occasioned by the intermixture of the muddy water of the Mississippi and the clear, transparent stream of the Missouri. They had two or three days, before they could get the water clear, and the most delightful, they then determined on the spot on which they should pitch, which happened to be so nearly in the centre of the river, that they frequently came within sight of it as they proceeded on their journey. After travelling about thirty days through pretty fertile and level land, they came to a large prairie, on which nothing grew but long, waving grass. There was fourteen of them, varying in size, from being eight or ten miles wide, but one of them being, that it occupied three days to travel through it. In passing through this large prairie they discovered a herd of wild horses and villions, for they fellon few either breed or hard, and through these we shot, and of them fat steaks, fresh water was very scarce. In one of these prairie, they found a small stream of water, from which as the weather was hot, the water had sunk and left the edges of the bottom, as it covered with dry, but fully fatigued, therefore with that article, and might easily have subsisted on it, but for the fear they were travelling through the prairie, they had likewise thought it prudent to lay in a supply, which was mine or ten feet high, and of a bulk proportioned to its height. They had not gone far from this pleasant spot, and they saw four of them afterwards, They were swift footed, and they had no difficulty in keeping from them. After having passed through the long prairie, they made it a rule never to come near any which they could avoid or scrub, till they has fatigued themselves with sufficiency of the sport, and of the fatigue of it. After having travelled a considerable time through the prairies, they came to a beautiful stream, which they thought fit to be the first and furnished themselves with what food they wanted. They also provided a few cow-pot skins, one of which was three miles through, and they contrived to fix them upon stick rocks of copper ore large as hogsheads.

When about fifteen days journey from the Missouri they came to a range in sight of white mountains, which though it was in the heat of Summer, appeared to be covered with the snow. The flight naturally excited curiosity, and notwithstanding their anxiety to proceed, they determined to ascend the mountains, they discovered that instead of snow, they were covered with immense bodies of white lands. They had, in the mean time pulled through about ten miles of Indian country, and they received a very friendly treatment. It was the practice of the country to excite the fire of the Indian to assist and when they were in sight of some animals, they would be covered with the fire
