A General description and identification of the Principles, and Practice, which are implied where the Steam is used; to accompany each Engine, and to be with a power any equal to the weight of the atmosphere.

The advantage and fimple principle difcovered to the author, of applying unlimited powers, and fteam, from engines with a power equal to five or ten atmofpheres, either without the weight of the atmofphere, or with it, fimply fomes, or with the aid of a vacuum in the condenfer, or in the boiler, and fo fhewing the doubling the fuel on the new principle pro ves to be about fixteen times the fame effect.

Drawings of the fimple and fhort, new form of engines fuitable for producing and controlling motion, fuch as over the hull fpace, and with the hull weight, to fit them for water purpofes, for which no other would allow.

Tables of the fize and proportions of engines of the different powers, from the power of one to that of one hundred horfes; to fuit different purpofes; with the affiftance of a fcientific Engifh friend, employed in large experience and great abilities, capable of correcting many figures in the engineers art, this will render the work lucrative, and ufeful to thofe who are not in the other work.

The author hopes to be able to fhew, and demonftrate to principles fpecial of which he has already to offer the application of, with fo much economy, that the price of fteam tobacco alone, not exceeding one fixth or eighth of the expence, fhould be applied to produce power, and which will not require more than one third, or one quarter of the fuel and which will give the great purpofes of high power to the great cities, of cotton fpinning manufactory and marble fawing, grinding fhip timber, cheefe, plaifter and rolling iaftiers, &c. in cities—fawing timber on a or a mechanic—grinding grain, drawing water, raifing forges and furnaces, where water fufficient can be obtained—propelling hoiftings in fhip ftreets, and at many other head ores are now ufed, and tranfporting heavy bodies on fimple roads with great advantages over the means by which fuch things have hitherto been done. He may obtain, as in fevera other national and in Philadelphia Subjects which may lead to ufeful difcoveries.
