

ment among her acquaintances. Her daughter, Jane, (always known as Jennie), graduated in 1851, and Mary in 1868 from the Granville Female Seminary, an institution which had her sympathies and prayers for over half a century. Her sons all received a common school and academic education in Granville. Henry was graduated from Marietta College in 1859, and Elam from the same institution in 1863. Charles was prevented from entering college by delicate health, but after regaining his health in the army he pursued a special course at Dennison University in Granville.

Her efforts in the cause of education were not confined to her own children, for she always did what she could to influence others to see the great value to the church, the nation and the home, of educated young men and women, and many a young man or woman of meager means never forgot her kindly advice, or oftentimes material assistance, in the struggle for an education.

During the civil war she showed great interest in all the affairs of the country. On the morning
