force is respectable, of which I would give you a correct statement, but for a reason which has prevented my writing as fully as I wish, that is, lest my letters should fall into improper hands on their passage.

"Reports from the Main state that the government is tremblingly alive, and they treat the prisoners, our friends, with a degree of lenity which was not generally expected."

On the 28th June, General Miranda issued the following proclamation.

"FRIENDS AND COUNTRYMEN,

"The glorious opportunity now presents itself of relieving from oppression and arbitrary government, a people who are worthy of a better fate who ought to enjoy the blessings of the finest country in the universe which bountiful Providence has given them, but who are shackled by a despotism, too cruel for human nature longer to endure. Groaning under their present afflictions they hail with extended arms the Noble Cause of Freedom and Independence, & call upon you to share with them in the god-like action of relieving your distressed fellow creatures. Hasten then to join the standard of one who has the happiness to call himself your countryman, and is determined to release his country and to shed the last drop of his blood in promoting its happiness; an object of which he has never lost sight, for a moment of his life.

"There will be made a liberal distribution of land at the expiration of a twelve month, according to rank; and privates, from the instant of enrollment, will be entitled to Provisions and Clothing, with a quarter dollar per day as pay, not subject to any deduction.

"And you, brave volunteers of the island, who have cooly come forward to partake with us our honors, & to share with us our prosperity, hasten to follow those officers under whose care you have already been trained, and who are impatient to lead you on to victory and wealth.

"The gulph that Columbus first discovered and honored with his presence, will now witness the illustrious result of your gallant efforts.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MAY 13.

Lord Henry Petty moved the order of the day for taking into consideration his majesty's most gracious message.

The house having resolved itself into a committee for the purpose (lord Grey de Horwick in the chair), and the said message having been read.

Lord Henry Petty said, the object of what he had to propose, was in the first instance, that an annuity of 5000l. should be voted to Earl Nelson, and his heirs, from the consolidated fund; and a grant of 120000l. for maintaining the dignity of the family of the late Baron Nelson the larger part of which to be applied to the erection of a house, and the remainder vested in the funds, for the use of the said family. Although he felt that nothing was necessary to insure the concurrence of the house in this grant, it was not possible for any one to feel so in the situation that he then stood in, as to be able to abstain from saying a few words, and expressing how highly gratifying was the task of making such a proposition. There was no saving, however large, in the national expenditure that he could, with more complete satisfaction, have had to announce, than he now experienced in proposing this grant as out of it might be expected the fairest results, arising from the influence of perpetuated example and the solid marks of national gratitude. It could not be expected that he should descant on the merits of the illustrious person who had deserved so much of his country; but he was sure that history did not furnish such a claim to the grateful affection of a nation. If he could look to his early life, and the splendor of his latter actions did not dazzle the prospective, even there was sufficient for unceasing admiration. But however brilliant were his achievements in the beginning of the last war, they were eclipsed by those which marked the close of that war, and the commencement of the present. As his glory increased his call for public service was extended. Almost immediately after the war with Spain commenced, we find that the valiant Nelson took a decided part in the action off Cape St. Vincent. It will be remembered, that soon after when in furtherance of the ambitious views of the French government a powerful fleet sailed against the east, he foild the hopes of France in that quarter by its complete destruction. Soon after his return, the combination of the nothern powers called again for his exertions, and under the walls of Copenhagen he put an end to a war that was levelled at the maritime consequence of his country. When the combined remains of the fleets of our enemies threatned the safety of our West-India possessions, he drove them hence, secured our colonies, and, when the enemy dared to shew themselves off Cadiz, consummated that splendid and decisive victory, which gave him death and immortality. Such a victory was worthy such a death!

Tu felix Agricola! non tantum vitæ, sed etiam opportunitate mortis.

It was not an attempt to discharge the immeasurable debt of gratitude for which this grant was proposed, but for the sake of handing down to posterity an example, and in the family of the noble lord, a living testimony, that no difficulties, no increase of burthens, can extinguish the liberality of this nation, when called upon by such merits. He flattered himself, the committee would have no difficulty in acceding to the grant, and concluded by moving, "that the same should commence from the 21st of October, 1805."

Mr. Rose, said he by no means wished to interrupt the unanimity with which the motion would pass; but he wished to know, how the 120,000l. would be apportioned?

Lord Henry Petty, replied that 90,000l. would be expended in the house and estate, and the remaining 30,000l. made applicable to the exigencies of the present Earl. Independently of these sums, it would be proposed to allow 10,000l. to the two sisters of the late Lord Nelson; and a provision would be made for the widow of Mr. Scott, the Secretary of Lord Nelson, who fell in the action off Trafalgar, and to whom his Lordship was extremely attached.

Mr. Francis, said he was fully convinced of the value of Lord Nelson's services, but, in the present times, he thought we should apportion our rewards to circumstances. He could not help thinking that this grant was more than enough; not if the noble Lord had been himself alive to enjoy it, or if he had left issue; but under the circumstances that did exist, he must consider it excessive.

Mr. Wilberforce thought that no degree of acknowledgement, or reward, for the services of Lord Nelson, could be considered excessive, and (lord Henry Petty) had stopped even where he had; nothing was too affluent, or too illustrious for the family. He could not help expressing a desire, that the estate and house should be in some conspicuous situation; Portsdown, or somewhere near Plymouth would be eligible, that our fleets might see the splendid mansion, and every British sailor's heart be animated to emulation by the sight. Such an advantage would be cheaply purchased at any rate; its effect would be permanent, and every body wished for it.

After a few words in a low tone of voice, by Lord Henry Petty, the question was unanimously agreed to, and the report was received.
