

The War in American Sculpture

"WAR," by Renee Prahar, an angular, monster-like work showing Combat as a devourer, blinded by greed, stalking across the country

AMERICA, 1917; according to Belle Kinney, who says America has armored half the world, and now, prepared itself, stands ready to meet all opposition.

THE WAR BRIDE, as conceived by Edouardo Cammilli, a Latin sculptor who has lately adopted this country as a fatherland. His is one of the most successful portrayals of the greatest tragedy of war-events.

THE CALL. This work, by Edouardo Cammilli, is the first sculpture to be accepted for use on recruiting posters, or at recruiting stations. It was presented to the government for this purpose by its author.

AMERICA, Harry Dickenson Thrasher's materialization of the spirit of 1917, as the Republic stands firmly behind the spirit of the eagle, about to take flight from the nation's breast.

THE HIKER, a familiar bronze by Allen G. Newman, idealizing the American soldier in his fighting togs, plucky, ready, tough—and perhaps a little cocky.
